

I am currently subscribed to my cable company's (Cablevision) internet access.

I am truly pleased with my download speeds, but I feel that the technology is there to allow the same upload speeds to remain equal to the download speed. If I get a maximum of 10 megabits down, I should get 10 megabits up. Also, I feel the cable companies need to be regulated by the federal government, and give consumers the right to utilize this service as much as possible. I am tired of upload caps, the RIAA and MPAA getting in everyones' faces like they are the Supreme Beings. and stop blaming piracy for a bad encomy and the real loss of sales in music and movie tickets. Cable companies have the resources to provide excellent, possbily the best Internet access inthe world, yet they are halfass and only give consumers what they are told to by non-government organizations. The FCC has to really get a hold on what is going on and say this is the way it should be, because everything should be fair. Thank you.
